Lack of sufficient controls: DSLR cameras can capture high-quality movies, but because the camera's first function is to take still images, it has fewer controls for moviemaking. Many DSLR models offer little control over exposure while shooting. Limited recording time: Some cameras limit capture to 12 minutes at a time in the full HD mode. This limit shouldn't present a problem because you would rarely need to have such a long continuous take for a film you will edit.

Moviemaking shutter speeds. Video capture uses a small selection of the shutter dial, generally ranging from 1/30 of a second to 1/250 of a second. That pales in comparison to the range between 30 seconds and 1/4000 of a second for still photography. Although the video shutter speeds occupy a narrow band, they can still depict a low-light subject as well as depict the fast-motion gruesome detail of a zombie apocalypse.
