Double-paned windows provide home and property owners with security from outside elements and some degree of protection from breaking and entering. The downside to double windows is that they can be prone to collecting condensation that results in parts of the window fogging up and decreasing visibility. The buildup is a result of aging sealant that breaks down and cracks, which allows moisture to enter.

One of the main reasons single and double hung windows can be difficult to open is due to a build-up of dirt, grime, dust, debris, and even bugs inside the window's tracks. The build-up results in friction, making it difficult for the windows to slide up or down. Removing the build-up and spraying with a lubricant will usually solve the problem.
